My dear Sir:

Your valued article is at hand, and I thank you for the promptness of its sending.

Its length would be no objection, if we had the space available for so extended a discussion of so important a theme. The copy furnished would occupy about five columns of our paper. I think I can, in this case, divide the article, and give it in two successive issues of the periodical. This will, however, shut out the possibility of any re-print of the article from the printer. For is this to be regretted, in comparison with this larger supply of original material; especially as you have referred to that article in a foot-note.

Other articles by other eminent specialists crowd for space; and the lessons follow each other in rapid succession, with new phrases of scientific and critical discussion demanding attention. This limits as inevitably in the presentation of material on any one theme.

I am sure that your article has a completeness in itself that will make it exceedingly valuable to the better class of our readers; and I <sup>know</sup> they will be grateful <sup>to you</sup> for its writing.

Yours with high regard,

Wm. Dawson
etc. etc.

H. Gray Cromwell

P.S. I retain for a brief season your copy of The Ex- position; as I may quote from it in a conference of recent explanations of Genesis in the light of modern science.
