THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

LITERARY, RELIGIOUS, SCIENTIFIC, AND POLITICAL.

Half-a-Crown, Monthly.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW has occupied for eighteen years a foremost place among the literary periodicals of Europe. It was founded in 1866, to serve as an organ of educated opinion in England and among English-speaking people, in the same way as the Revue des Deux Mondes had formed and expressed educated opinion in France.

The principal aim of its conductors has been to furnish an arena for the earnest and thorough discussion of the great questions of modern controversy in the realms of science, philosophy, and religion. To this end they have obtained the co-operation of the most eminent writers not only in this country, but also on the Continent and in America, so that whilst representing English thought, the CONTEMPORARY REVIEW has always been international and universal in the range and method of its discussions. The names of some of its contributors, found on the following pages, are an evidence and a pledge of this purpose to make the CONTEMPORARY REVIEW the meeting-place and exchange of the foremost thinkers in this and other countries.

The conductors of this Review avow their faith in the doctrines of a spiritual and theistic philosophy, and in the Christian doctrine of God and humanity; but they open its pages freely to serious and high-minded writers of every school, believing that it is only by open and honourable controversy that truth can be vindicated and harmonised.

The position which the CONTEMPORARY REVIEW has maintained, and the influence which it has exercised during so many years, show at once the widespread sympathy with which its aims have been appreciated, and the ability and fairness with which they have been carried out.

It is now proposed to add two new departments to this Review, which it is believed will obtain for it general acceptance, and meet an urgent want of educated readers in all parts of the world. These additions will make it still more conspicuously THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW—providing a contemporary record of the religious, political, literary, and scientific movements of the world, which will give its readers a coup d'œil of all that is most likely to interest them at the moment, or to be deemed by them worthy of preservation.

These two departments will consist of—

- (1) A series of monthly papers picturing the contemporary life and thought of the leading countries of the world, so that the readers of the CONTEMPORARY will be kept

au courant with the swiftly forming currents and tendencies of opinion that are giving birth to new political and social events, and that are inspiring the literary and critical labours, as well as the art, of each country.

(2) Monthly reviews of the work done in the great divisions of human knowledge and art, viz. :—Theology, Philosophy, History, Science, Literature, &c. In each month several of these sections will be treated, so that a descriptive and critical record will be periodically given of contemporary work in all departments. The object will not be merely to give a review of books, but to summarise the chief results of the work done in books, in reviews, in reports of learned societies, &c., whether written in English or other languages, and to summarise only what is of general importance for the educated public. Fulness of detail and of description cannot be given save in journals devoted to specific studies—but the commerce of intelligent men requires a prompt and authenticated acquaintance with the latest results of research or productions of genius. And such acquaintance will be furnished by these concise records, which will be written by men of eminent ability having special authority in the departments committed to them.

The conductors of the CONTEMPORARY REVIEW believe that these two additions will make the CONTEMPORARY REVIEW most valuable to scholars, professional men, and men of culture in every civilised country, giving them early information of the work of each country, and keeping them abreast with the rapid progress of human knowledge, and the new developments of national life and human genius throughout the world. They wish to make the REVIEW a desideratum in every private and public library, as a permanent record of the varied phenomena of modern thought and life which it photographs month by month.

The CONTEMPORARY REVIEW has always devoted special attention to those subjects that press with growing urgency on the minds of clergymen and the leaders of the Christian Church, in view of the new speculations of science and of Biblical criticism, the new controversies on Church organization and authority, the social problems to be solved by Christian philanthropy, and the religious condition of the people.

Many of the most important contributions to modern apologetics, such as Bishop Lightfoot's articles in reply to "Supernatural Religion," have appeared in the CONTEMPORARY REVIEW. During the ensuing months other contributions of the same order will appear, and in addition there will be articles by theologians and statesmen of high reputation on "Modern Evangelical Views of the Structure and Authority of the Bible," "The Church of the Future," "Puseyism," "Tithes," "Popular Religion," "Christian Socialism," "Different Aspects of the Temperance Question," "Christianity in Relation to Political Freedom," and kindred subjects.
