

it is probable that in some instances, at least, the terraces & lateral accumulations of the valleys have been formed along the shores of retreating lakes, or arms of the sea. As given, I don't think the statement however is likely to do much harm & so do not attach much importance to its correction if it should appear in any way to be incorrect or too late.

There are letters of Wotter's & Rankine which should be answered, but as there is really nothing to write about just now I must put off doing so. At Lytton I hope to find a mail, & may then be inspired with something of more general interest.

Today I feel easy, & have not, besides, got through the last ictures which arrived some time since.

You will observe that I have allowed myself to begin Calculating when I may get home again, as the time begins to look short; & half an Hours talk is worth a hundred letters.

Yours affectionate Son
 George.
