Dear Mr. Lane,

I did not hear from you last evening, but scarcely expected to. Probably I shall get a letter to-night. We have east wind to-day and it is really cold. This morning it was cloudy and rained a very little, but this afternoon the sun is shining. Lois has still a little cold, but it is passing off and the huskiness of yesterday has almost disappeared to-day. Constance is still a little cranky and declined to eat her tea last evening because there was no cake on the table. On this air, however, she will soon be too hungry for such pranks. Altogether the children have been very good and Bernard has made himself most useful.

There has been no butcher round as yet, but we got a fine salmon yesterday and sent most of it to Mac-nider's ice-house - so we shall not starve.

Constance has already lost both her rubbers, but I fancy we shall be able to get another pair here. The spring-beds, flour, nails, soap

we are at the station, but I have not sent for them yet as I am waiting to see if any thing further comes - the windows from Shearns, for example

I think Bridget (Bernard calls her Richard) will turn out useful and obliging and Millie so far has been most careful and thoughtful about the children.

Dearest Love, my mind and heart are with you and dear little Con. How gladly would I give my own wretched life for his. If he cannot come down here and has to go elsewhere, then I must go whatever the consequences; for I cannot bear the thought of your being again separated from the larger part of the family.

I enclose two more tickets which you might offer to your father for their servants. They cost $9.90 each.

The post leaves at 3 p. m. now and I shall be late if I do not hurry. I have just written to Mrs. Motson.

With all love to yourself and Con.

Your own Bernard,

Tell Con. that Bernard has been pressing some flowers to send to him.

I should be glad if Scarff would send a small package of hellebore by post at once.
