Dr. Osler became interested in a young Englishman with whom he often sat at dinner at the Club in Montreal. Noticing one evening that he looked ill and suffering he questioned him and, becoming suspicious of the symptoms, went with him to his rooms and discovered smallpox, removed him to the hospital, and looked after him during a serious attack that proved fatal. Finding out his name and the address of his people in England; he wrote them and gave all the information longed for by the family. Years afterwards, he met the sister at a dinner-party at Oxford, she being attracted by the name and remembering the Montreal smallpox incident. He afterwards visited the aged mother and gave the details for which she had yearned, and was able to have a photo taken of the grave and sent to England.
