

From Dr. Malloch's Journal.
Dec. 8. 1919.

Asked me if I had any notes of the case and said "If I pull through, I must write it up from the patient's standpoint." Lady O. reading Marius, the Epicurean to him.

- ✓ 7.XII.19. He had a somewhat better day. Slept for a little while in the a.m. and woke perspiring a bit. Temp. dropped to 99'. After lunch read the paper for a time and Lady O. read to him. Had loose stump of a tooth pulled out. Patient flushed, temp. arose about 7 p.m. to 100.6'. Altogether he seemed a wee bit more cheerful. Pulse a little stronger.
- ✓ 8.XII.19. After break. Collier and Gibson found him a little better. He said "remember the brain is not yours; you're all here as witnesses. It is to go the Institute at Wistar" and Gibson said "I know that". Sweated on waking about one p.m. After some sleep and temp. fallen to normal he asked me what the w.b. cells had been and when he heard 27,000 said "there must be some sepsis". Has some stomatitis. In afternoon wrote his will, and Gibson and I witnessed it. T. up to 100.2' in the evening. On the whole is better. Asked me if I had any notes of the case and said "If I pull through I must write it up from the patient's standpoint". Lady O. read Marius the Epicurean. He read the paper for a time.
- ✓ 9.XII.19. Seems a little better. Temp. normal for some hours in the afternoon, rose to 99.8' about dinner time. Feels flushed then and now looks forward to having cert. symptoms at this time of the day. He calls them toxic. Coughs more in the afternoons and retches and vomits a little with the coughing at time that he is flushed. Pulse is now regular certainly but still about 104.
